ENGLISH DICTIONARY

ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES.

(VOLUME VI. L–N.)

MOVEMENT—MYZOSTOMOUS.

BY

HENRY BRADLEY, HON. M.A., PH.D.

NOTE.

This instalment (which completes Vol. VI, the letter N having been already published) includes 1793 Main words, 447 Special Combinations explained under these, and 1169 Subordinate entries; in all 3409. The obvious combinations recorded and illustrated number 368, making a total of 3777. Of the Main words 342 (19 %) are marked † as obsolete, and 92 (5 %) are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

Comparison with Dr. Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries gives the following figures:—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic'.*	'Century' Dict.	Funk's 'Standard'.	Here.
Words recorded, Movement to Myzostomous	293	1902	1819	2033	3777
Words illustrated by quotations	197	470	447	133	2652
Number of illustrative quotations	687	609	698	181	10072

* Including the Supplement of 1902.

The number of quotations in the corresponding portion of Richardson is 552.

In this section the Latin and Romanic derivatives form by far the largest etymological class; indeed they would still do so even without the extensive group of words beginning with multi-, which fill nearly eight pages. The native English element of the vocabulary is not abundantly represented, but includes some important words, such as much, murder, must vb., and the pronouns my, myself. From Greek are most of the words beginning with my-, among which are several that are of special interest, as mystery, mystic, myth, mythology; among the Greek derivatives, though proximately from Romanic or Latin, may also be reckoned muse sb.[1], museum, music and the related words. Adoptions from Oriental, American, and Australian languages are more than ordinarily abundant.

Among the words in this section that present interesting points in the history of their senses and applications are moyen sb.[1], muck, muffle (six sbs. and two verbs), mulier (the sense of which in Piers Plowman has hitherto been misapprehended), mump (two verbs), munition, murder, muse sb.[1] and vb., must vb., muster sb. and vb., mute adj., mutiny, mussle sb. and vb., mystery, mystic, mythology. To these may be added Mr. and Mrs., which are no longer functionally mere abbreviations, but have come to be the sole recognized modes of writing the titles which they represent, and are therefore here treated as independent words.

Fuller or more accurate etymological information than is given in former English Dictionaries will be found under moss sb.[1] and sb.[2], moxa, muchender, mugwort, mulberry, mull vb.[3], mullion, murder, muscari, muse sb.[1], musk, mustachio, mustang, mustard, muster sb. and vb., mutchkin, mutton, mussle sb.[1], mya, myall [1] and [2], mystery.

With this section are given the Preface to the letter M, and the title-page, etc., for Volume VI.

[OE. múga, múwa, múha wk. masc., corresponding to ON. múge swath, also crowd of people (in the latter sense also múg-r str. masc.; cf. MSw. moghe masc., multitude, Sw. dial. muga, muva fem., heap, Norw. muga, mua, mue fem., heap, muge masc., heap, crowd). The word also exists in the compound ON. almúge, almúg-r (MSw. almoghe, -mogher, Sw. allmoge, Da. almue), common people.

Evidence that the word existed in some other Teut. lang. may possibly be afforded by Sp. muga landmark, pile (so app. med.L. muga from Spain), which, however, some scholars assert to be from Basque; and med.L. mugium hay-stack (one example from Italy dated 1334). The conjecture that the first element in OHG., MHG. mûwerf MOULDWARP represents this word is very doubtful.]

In England now mainly dialectal; in the U. S. it seems to be general.

OF. moe, moue mouth, lip, pout (mod.F. moue pouting grimace), of obscure origin; or perh. a MDu. mouwe of the same meaning.

The MDu. word is prob. from OFr.; some, however, think that it was the source, regarding it as a special use of mouwe thick flesh (Mow *sb.*⁴), from which sense the senses 'thick lip', 'pout' are assumed to have been developed.

In England the word has little colloquial currency, and the pronunciation is uncertain. The British Dicts. give (mau), the recent U. S. Dicts. (mōʊ). In Scotland, where the word is still in use, the sound is (mau).]

2. Any substance used like moxa for burning on the skin.

It seems unnecessary to suppose that there is an allusion to any genuine name of a coin. MOIDORE, if the word existed so early, may have furnished Shaks. with the suggestion; but our oldest instance is of the 18th c. That the Pg. moeda was familiar to Shaks. is unlikely. Still less plausible is Douce's suggestion, that the word is the F. muid (Moy sb.[1]).

2. As a prefixed title. Now pronounced (mi·stə), or with entire absence of stress (mistə, m'stə). The want of a plural form is supplied by Messrs., MESSIEURS 2.

Until the latter half of the 17th c. the title was often written in the full form master; but there is reason for believing that from the 16th c. it was, at least in rapid or careless speech, treated proclitically, with consequent alteration of the vowel of the first syllable. (See MISTER *sb.*2 1, quot. 1551.) Eventually the word came to have the weakened pronunciation whenever it was used as a prefixed title, and it became customary to employ the abbreviated spelling always for this use, and for this only. Hence at the beginning of the 18th c. master and Mr. were already regarded as distinct words. Cf. MISTER *sb.*1, which is merely an occasional (chiefly jocular) rendering of the pronunciation of the word of which 'Mr.' is the accepted spelling.

The early history of the application of Mr. is identical with that of the use of its fuller form: see MASTER sb. 21. From the 17th c. it has been the customary ceremonious prefix to the name of any man below the rank of knight and above some humble but undefined level of social status, except where usage requires the substitution of some honorific title, such, for instance, as those denoting military and naval rank. As with other titles of courtesy, the inferior limit for its application has been continually lowered; at the present day any man however low in station would be styled 'Mr.' on certain occasions, e. g. in the address of a letter. Modern custom forbids the use of the prefix when Esquire is appended to the name, and it is now omitted after 'The Hon.' and 'The Rev.' (though some still write 'the Rev. Mr. A.' when the Christian name happens to be unknown); but in other than ceremonious use 'Mr.' is substituted for these titles.

The use of Mr. before a prefixed title of office is nearly obsolete. The Judges of the Supreme Court are still styled 'Mr. Justice A.'; the designations 'Mr. Baron A.', 'Mr. Serjeant B.', belonged to dignities now abolished. In municipal use we still occasionally read of 'Mr. Alderman A.', 'Mr. Deputy B.', 'Mr. Councillor C.'.

Before an official title not followed by the name, the prefix Mr. is still common, as in 'Mr. Chairman', 'Mr. Editor', 'Mr. President', 'Mr. Mayor'. These are now used only vocatively; 'Mr. Speaker' is used also in the 3rd person.

2. As a prefixed title of courtesy. Now pronounced (mi·sis, mi·siz).

In the latter half of the 17th c. there was a general tendency to confine the use of written abbreviations to words of inferior syntactical importance, such as prefixed titles. The form Mrs. for mistress therefore fell into disuse exc. when prefixed to a name; and in this position the writing of the full form gradually became unusual. The contracted pronunciation, which in other applications of the word has never been more than a vulgarism (see MISSIS), became, for the prefixed title, first a permitted colloquial licence, and ultimately the only allowable pronunciation. When this stage was reached, Mrs. (with the contracted pronunciation) became a distinct word from mistress. As to the chronology of these changes evidence is wanting; but it may be noted that Walker 1828 says that mistress as a title of civility is pronounced missis, and that 'to pronounce the word as it is written would, in these cases, appear quaint and pedantick'.

a. Prefixed to the surname of a married woman (sometimes with her Christian name or that of her husband intervening).

Originally distinctive of gentlewomen, the use of the prefix has gradually extended downwards; at the present time, every married woman who has no superior title is styled 'Mrs.' even though her husband is of so humble a position as not ordinarily to be referred to as 'Mr.'. In British use the insertion of a woman's Christian name after Mrs. (as 'Mrs. Mary Smith') is rare exc. in legal documents, cheques, or the like, the normal practice when distinction is needed being to insert the husband's name (as 'Mrs. John Smith'). In the U.S. both these modes of designation are in general use.

Late in the 18th c. the title (usually, but not always, followed by the Christian name) was applied occasionally to elderly maiden ladies (as 'Mrs. Elizabeth Carter', 'Mrs. Hannah More') after this use had ceased to be general.

The L. mūlus was adopted at an early period into most of the Teut. langs.: MLG., OHG. (MHG.) mūl, MDu. muul (mod.Du. muil, early mod.G. maul), ON. múll (Sw. mula, Da. mule). A 14th c. survival of the OE. mūl may perh. be found in the isolated form moul in the Göttingen MS. of the Cursor Mundi. The obsolete forms muil, moil, represent an Eng. development of OF. ū, which is found also in other words, as recoil, oïs (= Use).]

1. The offspring of a he-ass and a mare. Also popularly applied to the offspring of a she-ass and a stallion (technically called a Hinny).

The mule combines the strength of the horse with the endurance and surefootedness of the ass, and is extensively bred for certain employments for which it is more suited than either; it is ordinarily incapable of procreation. With no good grounds, the mule is a proverbial type of obstinacy.

Multepli, Multer: see MULTIPLY, MULTURE.

Multi- (mʌ·lti), occas. before a vowel mult- (e.g. multangular, multiarticular, multocular), combining form of L. multus much, many. The compounds having this prefix in Latin belong for the most part to non-classical times: they are chiefly of parasynthetic formation, in which multi- = 'many', as multangulus many-angled, multicaulis many-stalked, multigenerus of many kinds, but a certain number of objective or adverbial compounds also existed, in which multi- = 'much', as multibibus much-drinking, multicupidus desiring much, multiscius knowing much.

In English the compounds of multi- were originally either direct adaptations from Latin compounds or were modelled upon these, but in the 19th c. the prefix came into frequent general use with ppl. adjs. and sbs. (Cf. POLY-.) The earliest English borrowings from Latin were multifary (Lydgate), multifarious (Nashe, 1593), multifariously (Puttenham, 1589); they did not become numerous till the middle of the 17th c. The more important compounds (being chiefly those which have a continuous history from the 17th c. onwards) are entered as Main words; the present article comprises a typical selection of [illegible] terms and of compounds of [illegible]

The change of original ð into d (contrary to the general tendency to change d into ð before syllabic r) was prob. due to the influence of the AF. murdre, moerdre and the Law Latin murdrum.]

1. The most heinous kind of criminal homicide; also, an instance of this. In English (also Sc. and U. S.) Law, defined as the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought; often more explicitly wilful murder.

In OE. the word could be applied to any homicide that was strongly reprobated (it had also the senses 'great wickedness', 'deadly injury', 'torment'). More strictly, however, it denoted secret murder, which in Germanic antiquity was alone regarded as (in the modern sense) a crime, open homicide being considered a private wrong calling for blood-revenge or compensation. Even under Edward I, Britton explains the AF. murdre only as felonious homicide of which both the perpetrator and the victim are unidentified. The 'malice aforethought' which enters into the legal definition of murder, does not (as now interpreted) admit of any summary definition. A person may even be guilty of 'wilful murder' without intending the death of the victim, as when death results from an unlawful act which the doer knew to be likely to cause the death of some one, or from injuries inflicted to facilitate the commission of certain offences. It is essential to 'murder' that the perpetrator be of sound mind, and (in England, though not in Scotland) that death should ensue within a year and a day after the act presumed to have caused it. In British law no degrees of guilt are recognized in murder; in the U. S. the law distinguishes 'murder in the first degree' (where there are no mitigating circumstances) and 'murder in the second degree'.

1. Mythology. (Now usually with capital.) One of nine sister-goddesses, the offspring of Zeus and Mnemosyne (Memory), regarded as the inspirers of learning and the arts, esp. of poetry and music.

In Greek antiquity there were other accounts as to the number of the Muses and of their parentage. The names of the nine Muses appear first in Hesiod, who says that Calliope is the chief of them. Later mythologists assigned to each of the Muses a particular class of functions, which, however, are less definitely limited than they appear in modern allusive use, where Clio is the Muse of history, Thalia of comedy, Melpomene of tragedy, Euterpe of music, and Terpsichore of dancing. The other names, Erato, Polyhymnia, Urania, and Calliope, are rarely mentioned in modern literature, as they have no well-known association with any particular branch of art or knowledge. Urania (lit. 'the heavenly'; in formal lists the Muse of astronomy) is invoked by Milton (P. L. VII.), who explains that he means not the fabled goddess of mythology, but the true celestial source of inspiration.

1. That one of the fine arts which is concerned with the combination of sounds, with a view to beauty of form and the expression of emotion; also, the science of the laws or principles (of melody, harmony, rhythm, etc.) by which this art is regulated.

Considered as an art, music has two distinct branches, the art of the composer and that of the executant. The word is often used with special reference to the executive branch, and to instrumental execution rather than vocal; thus, the designation of 'a teacher of music' is usually apprehended to mean one who teaches the art of playing on some instrument.

II. Used as a pres. tense, and hence (under certain conditions) as a past tense corresponding to this.
The use as a present arose from the practice of employing the past subj. as a modestic, cautious, or polite substitute for the present indicative. The modern use as a past tense coincides with sense 2, but app. does not historically descend from it, exc. that the preterital use in must needs (see NEED, NEEDS advs.) may perhaps represent a continuous survival.

3. Equivalent to the older MOTE v. 2, expressing necessity: Am (is, are) obliged or required to; have (has) to; it is necessary that (I, you, he, it, etc.) should. In the second person, must now chiefly expresses a command or an insistent request or counsel; in the third person it tends to be restricted to the expression of a necessity which is either imposed by the will of the speaker, or relative to some specified end, or enunciated as a general proposition.

In modern use confined to instances of oblique narration, and of the virtual oblique narration in which the speaker has in his mind what might have been said or thought at the time. To say 'I must go to London yesterday' would now be a ludicrous blunder.

Mustaccio, mustacheo, obs. ff. MUSTACHIO.

Mustache: see MOUSTACHE.

Mustachio (mustǽ·ʃo, mʌs-). Pl. mustachios (-ʃoz). Forms: a. (from It. and Sp.) 6 (mostacchi It. pl.), mustachyo(e, (quasi-Lat. mostachium), 6-7 mustaccio, mostacho, 6-9 mustachoe, 7 mustatioe, mustacheo, mostachoe, 7-8 mustacho, 7, 9 moustachio, 8 mustachio, 8-9 mustachioe, 6- mustachio; β. (corrupt forms) 6 moucheachoe, muschachoe, muchacho, 6-7 mouchacho, 7 mochachoe; 6 mowchatowe, mutchatoe, mutchado, 6-7 muschatoe, 7 m(o)uchato(e, mushato(e, mochatoe, muchate, mus(t)chadoe, mochedoe, monchato(e, munchattoe; mouthchato; 8 mouthacho. [Adopted in 16th c., partly from Sp. mostacho, and partly from its source, It. mostaccio moustache, also face, snout, mostacchio moustache (cf. Albanian mustakes, Rumanian mustate moustache), a derivative of Gr. μυστακ-, *μύστα*ξ masc. (also *βύστα*ξ) moustache, a Doric word, commonly believed (notwithstanding the difference both in meaning and in gender) to be a dialectal variant of *μάστα*ξ fem., mouth, jaws.

In the 16-17th c. the word appears in a multitude of corrupt forms due to imperfect apprehension or recollection of the sound. Some of them suggest a pseudo-etymological association with Sp. muchacho boy.

In the sing. the word is almost or entirely obsolete, being superseded by MOUSTACHE; but the plural mustachios has considerable currency, sometimes occurring in books that have moustache in the singular. With regard to the pronunciation of the first syllable cf. MOUSTACHE.]

b. Mutation of libel (see quot. 1856).

1685 CONSETT Pract. Spirit. Courts III. i. § 2 (1700) 82 We now come to the other part of Mynsinger his purpose (Scil.) the mutation or changing of Libels; mutare Libellum, to change the Libel, is to vary and alter the substance of it. 1856 BOUVIER Amer. Law Dict. (ed. 6) II. 195 Mutation of libel, practice. An amendment allowed to a libel, by which there is an alteration of the substance of the libel.

6. Biology. Used (in contrast to variation) for the kind of change which results in the production of a new species. Applied by De Vries (Die Mutations-theorie 1901) to the process by which, according to his theory, a new species is suddenly produced by a departure from the parent type. Hence quasi-concr. a species resulting from this process.

1894 W. B. SCOTT in Amer. Jrnl. Sci. Nov. 372 Bateson's results..emphasize strongly the difference between variation and that steady advance along certain definite lines which Waagen called mutation. 1904 Westm. Gaz. 23 Apr. 12/3 It is with the origin of the minor species that the De Vries Mutation Theory is concerned. 1905 in Q. Jrnl. Geol. Soc. LXI. Proc. p. lxxiii, A mutation, in the palæontological and original sense, may be defined as a contemporaneous assemblage of individuals united by specific identity of structure inter se, and by common descent from a known pre-existing species, from which they differ in some minute but constant character or characters. 1907 Athenæum 31 Aug. 242/1 The theory of mutation..assumes that a species has its birth, its lifetime, and its death, even as an individual, and that throughout its life it remains one and the same. By a mutation it does not change itself, but simply produces a new type. The mutation 'is allied to its ancestor as a branch is to a tree'.

AF. misterie* (OF. mistere, mod.F. mystère masc.), = It. misterio, mistero, Sp. misterio, Pg. mysterio, ad. L. mystērium, a. Gr. μυστήριον, f. μῦς-*, root of μύειν to close (the lips or eyes): cf. μύστης MYSTES.

In classical Greek μυστήριον occurs chiefly in plural, denoting certain secret religious ceremonies (the most famous being those of Demeter at Eleusis) which were allowed to be witnessed only by the initiated, who were sworn never to disclose their nature. (See sense 9 below.) In the LXX the word occurs only in Daniel and the Apocrypha, where it has the sense of 'secret purpose or counsel' (esp. of a king or of God). This sense is found in the N. T., where the word also means sometimes a religious truth long kept secret, but now revealed through Christ to his Church, and sometimes anything that has a symbolic significance. In later Christian Greek μυστήριον became equivalent to SACRAMENT (in several passages the Vulgate renders it by sacramentum, even when it means only 'secret'; in other passages mysterium is retained). In OF. and English the Christian senses of the word naturally appear earliest.]

PREFACE TO THE LETTER M.

THE portion of the Dictionary which treats of the words beginning with M contains 12,988 Main words, 2,986 Special Combinations explained under these, 6,422 Subordinate entries, and 3,636 Obvious Combinations; in all 26,032 words. Of the Main words, 2,838 are marked † as obsolete, and 866 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.*

Etymologically considered, the words beginning with M form a typical portion of the English vocabulary, every one of the many sources of our composite language being represented, while none is overwhelmingly predominant. The words inherited from Old English are relatively less numerous than in some other letters, but some of them occupy unusually large space in the Dictionary on account either of their great variety of senses and applications, or of the multitude of their combinations. Among them is the verb make, the article on which fills eleven pages, and would have been much longer if every subtle variety of meaning had been explained and illustrated. Other native words of importance are man, meet vb., mind sb. and vb., moon, month, mother, much, more, most. The articles on the pronouns me, mine, my, myself, and the auxiliaries may and must, contain much that is instructive as bearing on the history of English syntax and idiom. The Scandinavian element is very sparsely represented, chiefly by words of local or dialectal currency, such as marram, maugh, may (a maiden); but there are also meek, mire, and a few other words in general use. The Latin and French derivatives surpass the native words both in number and in the amount of space required for their treatment, and a very large proportion of them have an interesting history. Such instances as manner, market, master, matter, measure, medicine, memory, mend, mischief, mission, mode, model, moment, monster, mount vb., move, movement, multiply (to mention only a few of the more prominent) show how indispensable a part of the word-store of modern English has come from French. Greek derivatives are present in more than average proportions. Besides those which were introduced in the Middle Ages through the medium of Latin and French, such as magic, mathematics, metaphysics, muse sb.[1], music, mystery, there are many later formations, especially with the prefixes mega-, meso-, meta-, micro-, miso-, mono-; and the words beginning with my- are also mainly of Greek origin. Of words from Celtic there are nearly a score, but few, if any, of them would be recognized as familiar by Englishmen generally. The adoptions from Continental Teutonic, and from Italian and Spanish, are somewhat numerous. One very characteristic feature of the M portion of the Dictionary is the multitude of words from Oriental, African, Australian, and American languages. It may be noted that in Arabic ma-, mi- (or me-), and mu- (or mo-) are prefixes forming participia and other derivatives; formations of this kind, which have been adopted into English from Arabic through the medium either of European or Indian languages, are macramé, magazine, mahal, marabout, Maugrabi, minaret, miskal, Mofussil, monsoon, Moslem, mosque, Mozarabic, muezzin, mufti, mullah, musellim, Mussulman. As the sound of the letter M is one that lends itself easily to echoic use, the number of onomatopœic words with this initial is considerable.

Among the many words the etymology of which is here more fully or more accurately treated than in other English dictionaries are macaronic, mad-apple, madrepore, maelstrom, magic lantern, major sb.[1], malignant, malmsey, mammon, mammoth, melanochroi, menstruum, meter sb.[3], methyl, middling, minus, minute, mire sb.[1] and sb.[2], mire-drum, miss sb.[1], mix vb., mohair, moor vb.[1], mother sb.[2], mould sb.[2], moxa, muckender, mustachio, mutton, mystery.

The material for MA- was sub-edited (before 1888) and subsequently revised (before 1900) by Mr. Joseph Brown, M.A., of the Grammar School, Kendal, who has since sub-edited some part of S, and is now working at U; ME- and MI- were sub-edited in 1884–5 by the late Rev. T. Sheppard, Exeter College, Oxford; MO- to MOND- in 1885 by the late Hon. and Rev. S. W. Lawley, Spurfield, Exminster; MONE- to MUCE- by the late Mr. J. Anderson, Markinch, Fife; and the remainder of the letter (MUCH to the end) in 1894 by the late Rev. J. Smallpeice, M.A., then of St. Bees. In 1899–1904 the whole of the material from ME- to MYZ-, which in the interim had more than doubled in quantity, was laboriously re-subedited by Mr. James Bartlett, B.A., Cloverlea, Bramley, near Guildford.

Among those who have rendered help of various kinds in the later stages of preparation of this portion of the Dictionary, it is fitting to mention in the first place three honoured workers who are no longer living to receive the grateful acknowledgement which is their due. Lord Aldenham, who had been a zealous and able collaborator in the work from its beginning, continued, in spite of his advanced age, to read the proofs, and to furnish valuable suggestions, until very shortly before his death. Dr. W. Sykes, F.S.A., who died in September, 1906, had read the proofs for the greater portion of the letter M, supplying a great number of additional instances of the words relating to medicine and the kindred sciences. Mr. E. L. Brandreth, whose abundant work for the Dictionary has been acknowledged in the prefaces to former issues, had latterly devoted himself to the verification at the British Museum of quotations from works not accessible in Oxford, a service which since his death has been performed by Mr. W. W. Jenkinson. In the revision of the proofs continued aid has been received from Mr. A. Caland, of Wageningen, Holland, the Rev. Canon Fowler, D.C.L., of Durham, Mr. H. Chichester Hart, the Rev. Professor Skeat, and the Rev. W. B. R. Wilson, of Dollar. For information on etymological questions thanks are due to Professors Margoliouth, Morfill, Napier, and Wright, of Oxford; Prof. A. Salmon, of Reading; Hr. Verner Dahlerup, of Copenhagen; Dr. A. Kluyver, of Leiden; and Mr. J. Platt, jun., whose extensive researches into the history of words from American Indian and other remote languages have been of great service. In the explanation of scientific terms valuable aid has been received from Professors Clifton and Love, Dr. V. H. Veley, Mr. A. E. Jolliffe, and Mr. C. Leudesdorf, of Oxford, and Prof. Sylvanus Thompson, of London. Among others who have rendered help on special points are Professors Bywater and Robinson Ellis, of Oxford; Sir W. R. Anson, Bart.; Sir Howard Elphinstone, Bart.; Mr. Horace Hart, M.A., Controller of the Oxford University Press; Mr. E. W. Hulme, of H.M. Patent Office; Sir F. Pollock, Bart.; Mr. W. H. Stevenson, M.A., of St. John's College, Oxford; Mr. R. J. Whitwell, B.Litt., Oxford; Mr. J. Maitland Anderson, St. Andrews University; and Mr. C. W. Ernst and Mr. Albert Matthews, of Boston, U.S.A. The constant assistance of Dr. F. J. Furnivall has, in this as in all former parts of the work, been of inestimable value. Special thanks are also due to Bodley's Librarian, Mr. Falconer Madan, Mr. A. E. Cowley, and the staff of the Bodleian Library generally; and to the Editor of Notes and Queries and the many correspondents of that periodical who have furnished replies to inquiries.

The members of the editorial staff who have been engaged on M are: Mr. Walter Worrall, B.A., Mr. C. T. Onions, M.A. (who has specially prepared the portions containing the words beginning with Mis-, Multi-, and My-), Mr. W. J. Lewis, Mr. H. J. Bayliss, Mr. James Dallas, Mr. G. R. Carline, and Miss E. S. Bradley.

ADDITIONS AND EMENDATIONS.

Machit, var. of MESQUITE.

Macute. The Rev. W. Holman Bentley, writing from the Congo Free State, informs us that makuta is the plural of ekuta, and denotes a bundle of ten mats of palm fibre, still used as currency north of the Congo near the French frontier. Elsewhere the word survives only as the name of the Angola 'penny' piece or its value. Mr. Bentley says that it is derived from a Congo verb kuta to tie, now obsolete, but preserved in the reversing form kutunuka to untie.

Mademoiselle. Earlier example:—a 1450 Knt. de la Tour (1868) 126 Madamoiselle I y praie you that ye answere not vnto this folk.

Maghoore, obs. variant of MOGUL.

Magnetician. Example:—1854 Percival's Poetical Light (ed. 2) 65 The electrician and the magnetician have assumed, respectively, an electric and a magnetic fluid.

Man sb.[1] 15. The view that CHESS-MEN originated as a corruption of chess-meinie is untenable, the word for 'chess-man' in AF. being regularly hom. Earlier instances of man in this sense are:—c 1400 Beryn 1520 The Burgeyse seid: 'comyth nere! ye shul se his man, How he shall be matid, with what man me list!' He drouge, & seyd 'chek mate!' c 1440 Gesta Rom. xxi. 71 (Harl. MS.) The first man, þat goth afore hath not but oo poynt, but whenne he goth aside, he takith two poynt. . . NOTE.

THIS double section includes about half of the words beginning with N, and contains 1530 Main words, 250 Combinations explained under these, and 1126 Subordinate entries of obsolete forms, etc., or 2906 in all. The obvious combinations recorded and illustrated by quotations number 563, bringing up the total to 3469. Of the Main words 374 are marked † as obsolete, and 55 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

Comparison with Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries yields the following figures:—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic'.	'Century' Dict.	Funk's 'Standard'.	Here.
Words recorded, N to Niche	284	1651	1643	1719	3469
Words illustrated by quotations	218	542	515	191	2896
Number of quotations	533	864	1508	281	17273

The quotations in the corresponding portion of Richardson number 674.

This portion of N is fairly representative of the different elements of which the English language is composed. The native words, as well as those of Latin and Greek origin, are numerous and important, and other tongues have added considerably to the stock. Among those which have come down from Old English, some of the most prominent are nail, naked, name, nap (sleep), narrow, nave (of a wheel), navel, neap (tide), near (=nearer), neat (cattle), neb, neck, need, needle, neigh, neighbour, nesh (soft), nest, nestle, net, nether, nettle, new, next, and the set of negative words na, natheless, naught (whence naughty), ne, never. These with their derivatives occupy a considerable part of this section. Of Scandinavian origin are naam, nab (peak), nais (a remarkable instance of the survival in dialect of a very rare word), nait (use, useful, to use), nait (to deny), narwhal, nay, near, neven (to name), and possibly one or two more, as nag (to annoy). From Dutch or Low German comes nap (of cloth); the Scottish need-nail is also of LG. origin. There still remains some doubt as to the precise source from which some words have come, as nag (horse), nap (to seize), nape (of the neck), nasty, natty, neeze (to sneeze), nese (the nose), nib, and nibble.

Many of the words of Latin origin have become firmly established in the language, and have produced a number of derivatives which are also in common use. Such are narrate (at one time a Scotticism), nasal, natal, natatory, nation, native, natural, nature, naval, navigate, nebula, necessary, necessity, negation, negative, neglect, negligence, negotiate, nerve, nervous, neuter.* The earlier among these were as a rule adopted through French, which has also supplied naïf and naïve, naissant, napery, navews, navvy, neat adj., nephew, nice (remarkable for the variety of senses it has received in English), and niche.

The Greek element is pretty large, and includes Naiad, Nemesis, Nereid; narcissus, nard(us, nectar, nepenthe(s; naphtha, narcotic, nausea, necropolis, neophyte (first prominent as one of the 'ridiculous inkhorn terms' in the Rhemish N.T.), nephritic. Many modern scientific terms have also been formed on Greek bases, such as necro-, nemato-, neo-, and neuro-. In necromancy, etc., the original Greek form has replaced the mediæval corruption nigro-, negro-.

Oriental languages are very fully represented by nabob, nadir, nagari, naib, naik, nainsook, naker, narghile, nautch, Nazarite‖, negus (of Abyssinia), nenuphar, etc. Various other tongues have contributed a few words, as namaycush, nancy, nandu, nanguer (whence Buffon's invention nagor), nardoo, nerka, niata, and names of persons or places are the source of nanny-jemmy, nankeen, nantz, nap sb.†, napoleon, and negus‡.

N

N (en), the fourteenth letter of the modern, and thirteenth of the ancient Roman alphabet, represents historically the Greek nū and the Semitic nun. The earlier Greek forms were Ν and Ч, corresponding to the Phœnician 𐤍. The sound usually denoted by the letter is a voiced nasal consonant with front closure (the point of the tongue touching the teeth or the fore part of the palate). It is, however, also capable of being used as a sonant or vowel, here denoted by ('n), as in bidden (bi·d'n), bitten (bi·t'n), slacken (slæ·k'n). With one or other of these values the letter is very frequent in English, and is silent only in a few cases at the end of syllables after l and m, as kiln, damn, condemn, contemn, limn, hymn, solemn, column.

Before the sounds (g) and (k) the letter n is also employed in English to denote a nasal with back tongue-closure, in this dictionary distinguished as (ŋ), as in finger (fi·ŋgəɹ), think (þiŋk). When not followed by these sounds, this back-nasal is expressed by the digraph ng, as in hang (hæŋ), sing, song. (On the difference in pronunciation between finger and singer, etc., see the note to the letter G.)

In Scottish texts of the 15-16th centuries the change of Latin and French gn to ng is frequently represented in the spelling of such words as sing sign, ring, reng reign, and ngn is common between vowels, as resingnit resigned, mangnitude, etc.

2. In OE. n is very frequent as the terminal letter of inflectional syllables, as in the -an of the infinitive and the oblique cases of weak nouns. In southern texts this n is always retained, but in the north it appears to have been generally dropped by the middle of the 10th century. In ME. the retention or dropping of the letter varied in the different midland and southern dialects. On the other hand, the -en of strong past pples., which became -e in southern dialects, was retained in the north as in modern English.

In inflectional syllables (as in reading, writing, etc.) -ng has in many dialects been reduced to n, and this pronunciation (usually called 'dropping one's g's') may sometimes be heard even from educated speakers.

3. In ME. the n of the indefinite article an is frequently transferred to a following word beginning with a vowel (while a converse process has given such forms as adder, apron, and auger). The forms thus produced occasionally alliterate with words properly beginning with n, and in one or two cases (as newt and nickname) have finally established themselves in the language. The following are examples of the practice from ME. and early modern texts.

c 1200 Bestiary 303 in O. E. Misc. 16 Tu wuldes selen .. ðat it were a neilond. a 1400-50 Alexander 1066 Alexander ..him a narawe hent. c 1420 Anturs Arth. 349 (Irel. MS.)
